STRANGER IN TOWN

"IS THAT you, Betsy?" Mrs. Chase called from the kitchen as she heard the front door slam.

"Yes, Mom," Betsy answered. She entered the kitchen and headed for the refrigerator, taking some milk and an apple.

"How was it getting back to school after mid-year vacation?"

"Just the same old grind. But there's a new boy in class . . . name is Gregg Mansfield."

"Oh," her mother said thoughtfully. "He must belong to the new family that just moved in down the block."

"What new family on this block? I never heard of them."

"I had heard that someone bought the old Matthews house, and I saw the moving van today . . . so it all adds up, right?" Mrs. Chase said. "What's he like, this Gregg?"

"Nice looking. Other than that, it's hard to tell, yet. Think I'll walk down that way and see what's what."

Betsy wandered off in the direction of the Matthews house. She was sixteen and in her second year at Centerdale High School. She was popular with the school crowd, and considered "cute" by all her friends . . . male and female. She was only 5'2" tall, on the slim side and had a round face topped by short, curly dark brown hair.

It was a changing time of her young life, a time when bobby socks and shirttails were being replaced by college heels and matching sweater and skirt outfits; a time when it was becoming fun to go to the movies with one special beau rather than with the crowd. From day to day, Mr. and Mrs. Chase never knew quite what to expect from their little girl who was growing up.

Things seemed pretty quiet around the Matthews house when Betsy passed by, though through the window she spotted people bustling around. She thought of ringing the bell and introducing herself . . . as a sort of one-man welcoming committee, but at the last minute decided to join the gang down at the ice cream parlor.

A few days later, Mrs. Chase rang the bell of the Matthews house and introduced herself to Mrs. Mansfield. After talking for a short while, she invited the Mansfields over for the following evening, Gregg included. Betsy was unexcited when she heard the news; however, she agreed to be a gracious and charming hostess as her mother directed.

Betsy was still upstairs when the Mansfields arrived. At her mother's call, she hurried down to the living room.

"Betsy, this is Mrs. Mansfield," Mrs. Chase said. Betsy shook hands with her.

"And this is Gregg's father." Betsy turned to Mr. Mansfield and stopped short. He looked very familiar.

"How do you do, Mr. Mansfields left, she said, "Betsy, what She suddenly recognized him. "It can't be," she thought. "Here in Centerdale. What would he be doing here?"

She smiled politely and went over to talk to Mrs. Mansfield. and her mother. Somehow she managed to feign conversation, but all the time she was wondering if he really could be who she thought he looked like. She remembered reading that he had a wife and a son about Gregg's age, and she thought she had heard someplace that he was considering retiring from the movies. But here in Centerdale . . .?

Mrs. Chase noticed that something was wrong with her daughter and after the Mansfields left, she said, "Betsy, what was the matter with you tonight? You kept staring at Mr. Mansfield."

"Mother, didn't you notice?"

"Notice what?"

"Doesn't Mr. Mansfield remind you of someone?"

"Well, I admit for a minute he did look a bit familiar, but I'm sure I don't know him. Just one of those familiar faces."

"No, mother," Betsy said impatiently. "Just imagine him without those glasses and with a small mustache. Now is he familiar?"

"No, I don't think so," her mother answered hesitantly. "Should he be?"

"Mo-other," Betsy cried, "It's Donald Madison, the movie star. I know it is."

"Betsy, where do you get your ideas? That man is Stanley Mansfield, and he's here doing some kind of survey for a magazine in New York."

"You have to admit that he looks a lot like Donald Madison."

"Well, they're both men, at least," her mother admitted.

"And he was kind of vague about his business here," Betsy continued.

"What's vague about working for a magazine?"

"Oh, mother. You have no imagination."

"And you have too much."

Betsy could hardly wait until the next day when she could tell her best friend Karen. Karen was thrilled at the idea that Gregg Mansfield's father was Donald Madison and secretly told it to Jane who secretly told Peggy who told Nancy. Soon the word had crept around to the entire crowd. Everyone . . . especially the girls . . . became overly friendly to Gregg, inviting him to parties, encouraging him to join clubs and trying to get him to invite them to his house.

Gregg was overcome by the attentions, and the Mansfields thought that the youngsters of Centerdale were a lovely group. Betsy and her friends started a habit of routing their activities to pass the Mansfield house, always in hope of "bumping into" Mr. Mansfield. On the few occasions when they did, they were too flustered to say anything more than a brief "good morning" or "good afternoon."

The Chases and the Mansfields became quite friendly. One evening the four of them were discussing the children when Mr. Mansfield mentioned that he had the oddest feeling that Betsy and her friends were acting strangely toward him.

"You know," Mr. Chase agreed, "Betsy has been acting rather peculiarly. She and her friends are always having hush-hush meetings and seem to be plotting some poor soul's doom."

"I wonder . . ." Mrs. Chase said thoughtfully. "The first night you came over, Stanley, Betsy was certain that you were Donald Madison incognito. I thought she had given up that nonsense, but perhaps not."

"I'm sure that must be it." Dorothy Mansfield said. "Stan has been taken for Madison before."

"Would I love to give those youngsters a run for their money," Stanley Mansfield said. "I've got a wonderful idea. I told you folks that I was here for a special survey. That's true as far as it goes. However, I have also been appointed the new editor of the Centerdale News, although it's not to be made public until the end of next week. I'm sure I could persuade the publisher to let me make the announcement at the annual parents-students social next week. Now here's what I have in mind . . ."

Rumor got around Centerdale the following few days that there was to be an exciting announcement at the parents-students affair, and after much speculation, rumor had it that the announcement had something to do with Stanley Mansfield. Betsy was certain that her original guess as to his identity was correct, and she went around telling her friends, "I told you so!" She was quite proud of herself when they patted her on the back, and she felt a personal interest as well as a personal triumph because the Mansfields had become good friends of her parents.

The entire student body of Centerdale High School and their parents arrived the night of the annual social. The parents were introduced to the teachers and to other parents, and after some punch and cake, the principal got up to speak. After thanking everyone for attending, he introduced Stanley Mansfield.

"As you know, my wife and I and our son Gregg, recently moved to Centerdale. We have found everyone to be friendly and we have been made to feel welcome by young and old alike.

"It has been rumored that I am not here only to do a survey for a magazine." Betsy's heart skipped a beat, and she looked knowingly at Karen. "The rumor is true. I didn't want the purpose of my move here to be known for a while, as I felt I would have a better chance to get to know the town and the people as just an ordinary citizen for a while." Again, Betsy felt butterflies in her stomach. She knew she was right.

"I'm sure you will all understand and forgive the deception. The truth is that starting Monday, I am the new editor of the Centerdale News."

There was applause. Everyone stood in approval . . . except Betsy who, sneaked out of the auditorium to avoid the eyes of her friends and her parents!
